A Missouri group says wind energy can create jobs and profits in the Show-Me state.

"The Missouri Partnership" is in Neosho this week, helping companies understand potential opportunities in the wind industry.

The group says it's not just wind farms, but also all of the supplies and parts those farms require to operate.

"It really addresses some of our environmental issues, as a country. It addresses our economics issues and it also addresses our dependence on foreign energy sources, and trying to make more of that energy for ourselves," says Christopher Chung, CEO of The Missouri Partnership.

He says the Midwest already has the most wind farms in the nation.

Manufacturers from across the Midwest are attending the conference looking for new ideas and opportunities.
